More than a decade ago, following the emergence of Bitcoin—the first peer-to-peer decentralized cryptocurrency—rival digital currencies began to take shape. Litecoin (LTC) emerged as an early digital asset within this burgeoning industry, designed to facilitate direct fund transfers between two parties without the need for intermediaries such as payment processing services or credit card companies.

Launched in late 2011 by former Google engineer Charlie Lee, Litecoin was developed by adapting the Bitcoin codebase. However, it distinguished itself through an increased total supply and a modified speed at which new blocks are added to its blockchain.

Often referred to as “digital silver” in contrast to Bitcoin’s “digital gold,” Litecoin offers an alternative mining algorithm and faster transaction settlement times compared to its more traditional counterpart Bitcoin. The total supply of Litecoin is capped at 84 million coins—approximately four times that of Bitcoin—and Litecoins are mined at a rate four times faster than Bitcoins, with block generation occurring every 150 seconds.

Additionally, Litecoin set itself apart from Bitcoin by utilizing a newer cryptographic algorithm known as Scrypt. Nevertheless, all mined tokens remain authenticated on the public ledger. Newly created Litecoins can be stored on cryptocurrency exchanges or in digital wallets accessible during transactions.

As of now, Litecoin boasts a market capitalization of approximately $13 billion. While it may face challenges in unseating Bitcoin from its position as the leading cryptocurrency, Litecoin undeniably maintains its status as a formidable competitor that continually pushes the boundaries of innovation.

As of writing the article, LTC is traded at $ 99.5324, boasting a market cap of $ 7.5B, and witnessing a hefty 24-hour trading volume of $ 1.6B. LTC saw a 24-hour price change of 1.30%, with minor fluctuations of 0.02% in the past hour.
