What is Arweave?

The Arweave network is a decentralized data storage network. It is a novel blockchain-based platform that enables permanent, secure, and efficient data storage. In June 2020, the Arweave network became live on the main net.

The main aim of the Arweave network is to provide a permanent and censorship-resistant data storage platform. The data stored on the Arweave network is immutable and cannot be deleted. The data stored on the Arweave network is encrypted and can only be accessed by the data owner.

The network's storage and retrieval functions require the network's native token, AR. Similar to Bitcoin, the Proof-of-Work method is used to mine AR tokens. Miners are rewarded with newly minted AR tokens as well as a portion of the transaction fees associated with the data stored on the network.

A secure, scalable, and cost-effective data storage option is offered by the Arweave protocol. Firstly, it is economical. Data is stored in a compressed format, which reduces storage costs. Secondly, it is secure. Data is encrypted and spread across multiple nodes, making it tamper-resistant. Finally, it is scalable.

Arweave network is constructed on top of a brand-new blockchain architecture called Blockweave, which provides a cutting-edge consensus process and token economic model that encourages network users to work together to provide long-term data storage.

The block weave data structure used by Arweave is similar to a blockchain, but with some important differences. Blocks in a block weave are not chained together linearly. Instead, they are linked together in a mesh-like structure. This allows for each block to reference multiple previous blocks, which enables the network to achieve high throughput and scalability.

Latest Arweave News

- Arweave, has surpassed a significant milestone of permanently storing over 1 billion pieces of data. This achievement was announced by the founder, Sam Williams, on Twitter.
