What is Bitgert?

Bitgert claims to be a Zero-Cost gas fee blockchain. Basically, a smart contract platform, where developers can build dApps. According to Bitgert, their blockchain can process 100,000 transactions per second with almost no fees.

Warning: Transaction fee is advertised as $0.000000001, however, for every transaction you make there is a 12% fee. The revenue generated from the 'fee' is then used for marketing in the form of sponsored articles. One interesting thing to note is this fee is applicable to everyone, but the creator.

Developers can build decentralised apps, unrestricted expansion, regardless of cost, and security in the network. Besides smart contract, you can write staking contract, create Defi Apps, and mint NFTs on this platform.

In February 2022, Bitgert finally made its long-awaited blockchain public. The much-hyped promise of gas-free transactions never came to pass, and Bitgert instead switched to a near-zero transaction cost structure. The BriseChain's block time is 15 seconds and it was created using a proof-of-authority consensus algorithm.

PoA blockchains are criticized for being extremely centralized, despite the fact that they are thought to be highly scalable. The Binance Academy states that this consensus algorithm paradigm is merely an attempt to improve the efficiency of centralized systems. While this makes PoA an appealing option for big businesses with logistical requirements, it does raise some concerns, particularly in the context of cryptocurrencies.

In short, Bitgert may be faster, but it is very much centralised.

BRISE is the native token that powers Bitgert network. On the Binance network, it was first released as a BEP-20 token. The coin was changed into the native BRISE chain token following the introduction of the BRISE Chain. Users will receive staking incentives in BUSD when they stake their BRISE.

Additionally, the BRISE dApp Wallet, which has no transaction fees, uses the BRISE token as a peer-to-peer payment method. By eliminating the need for a middleman, it enables direct exchange of cryptocurrency fees between buyer and seller.

The BRISE coin is now a more desirable token to keep thanks to the platform's addition of a repurchase idea to cryptocurrency. The buyback strategy increases investor confidence to buy and hold the coin, hence aiming to raise both its price and demand. In the event that a sale takes place, a portion of the buyback tax paid is utilized to buy tokens from the liquidity pool, which are burnt right away after the buy.

Latest Bitgert News

- Bitgert (BRISE) announces the upcoming launch of its GEO WEB3 Real Estate Marketplace on the Bitgert chain, set to occur on June 25th, 2023. Bitgert's Roadmap in 2023

The Brise roadmap outlines the development plans for 2023. The first six months will focus on creating the Web 3.0 Geo Data Map Core Files and the Decentralized Freelancer Framework. The team aims to launch a BETA version of the Web 3.0 Geo Data Map and work on the UI Wireframe for the Decentralized Freelancer platform. Additionally, they will develop the Web 3.0 Oracle Market Framework.

In the second half of 2023, Brise plans to launch the Web 3.0 Geo Data Map on the MainNet and continue developing the Decentralized Freelancer Framework. They will also launch a BETA version of the Decentralized Freelancer platform. Furthermore, the team intends to integrate Bitcoin and Ethereum into the Web 3.0 Oracle Market Framework and launch the Decentralized Freelancer platform on the MainNet. These goals will add more value to the Brise ecosystem and benefit its users.

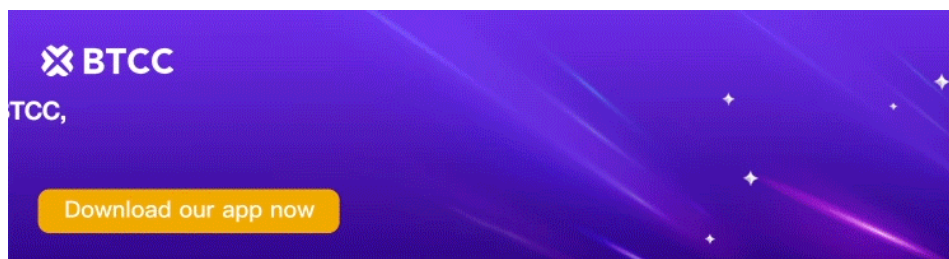

History of Bitgert

Bitgert was first introduced on the Binance Smart Chain, and it paid out incentives using Binance Coin. The project's plan states that Bitgert initially debuted in July 2021 with the introduction of its website and the placement of its native BRISE coin on Binance's DEX, Pancake Swap.

Before changing its name to Bitgert in December 2021, the project was once known as Bitrise. The biggest advancement in the blockchain project to far came in February 2022 when Bitgert introduced its native BRISE Chain, which was supported by the BRC20 smart contract. On the Bitgert network, developers can now create dApps thanks to the debut of its own blockchain network.

To provide quick block times and affordable costs, the BRISE Chain uses a method of proof-of-authority. In addition to being interoperable with the Ethereum Virtual Machine, the BRISE chain features smart contract functionality.

On the BRISE chain, developers can create wallets and other dApp-related tools, create new tokens, operate full nodes to get real-time updates on transactions, blocks, and consensus activities, and run full nodes to run new tokens. A significant part of the countless projects that have surfaced on the BRISE chain may be attributed to the advent of the network's incubation program, Bitgert Startup Studio.
